Technologies of Wonder: Rhetorical Practice in a Digital World

Acknowledgements

I have so many people to thank:

My steadfast and supportive colleagues in Digital Media Studies at The Ohio State University: Cynthia Selfe, H. Lewis Ulman, and Scott DeWitt;
My friends and colleagues at Ohio State, Mansfield, especially Barbara McGovern, Norman Jones, Cynthia Callahan, and Carolyn Skinner, for their willingness to read, or talk, or just listen;
My collaborator and provocateur, Ben McCorkle, for always seeing the possibilities in off-the-wall ideas.

The wonderful and creative people at Computers and Composition Digital Press: Gail Hawisher, Cynthia Selfe, Melanie Yergeau, Karl Stolley, Patrick Berry, Jason Palmeri, Tim Lockridge, and Ryan Trauman;
Mary Hocks and Dànielle Nicole DeVoss, whose thoughtful reviews and suggestions for the press guided my final revisions;
Utah State University Press editor, Michael Spooner, for his faith in and support of Computers & Composition Digital Press and new media publishing;
The editors of the journal Kairos, where early portions of this project were published in a different form, and Cheryl Ball in particular, for her infectious enthusiasm and advice at all the right times.

The Ohio State University at Mansfield, for supporting my research with a seed grant;
The Digital Union at Ohio State, where Victoria Getis paved the way for my education in Flash and InDesign.

My profound thanks to the image-makers who always have and always will inspire my work; and to the students who have bravely followed me into digital terra incognita and made magical things there.

Finally, there are three people without whose love and support none of this would have happened: my mentor, colleague, and dear friend, Nan Johnson; my fierce (and sorely missed) friend and intellectual sparring partner, Jim Buckley; and my loving, generous, and so patient husband, George Delagrange.
