As with all projects, we build and draw from others who have struggled through similar challenges. The initial seed for Generaciones started about six years ago when Cindy Selfe and Gail Hawisher were conducting surveys for their project on literacy, now titled Literate Lives in the Information Age. Cindy had asked that I find some willing participants here on the border willing to fill out their survey. I enthusiastically obliged. In the process, the idea for Generaciones was born. In turn, Cindy and Gail encouraged me throughout the four years of research and revisions, and I thank them for this. A once-blind reviewer, Susan Romano, gave wonderful suggestions for tighter revisions, and along the way, she unselfishly shared words of praise and encouragement. I am truly thankful for those encouraging words, real lifesavers when the dark days of writer's blues strike. Thank you to all the participants in Generaciones for the time they took to fill out such a lengthy survey and for sharing their stories. For the participants who agreed to come in to my office for a follow-up video interview, I thank you for your support and admire you for your excellent interviews. To Yowei Kang for his help in the massive data recording of participant responses, to Stephanie Vie for her keen editorial skills, and to Jessica Yllarramendi for creating a wonderful teaser video for Generaciones. And last, to Victor Villanueva, who graciously found the time to create the wonderful video foreword.

On the home front, I thank my children, Natalie, Elaine, and Ethan, for understanding the time I put into this massive project, and I apologize to them for the times I missed out on. To Scout, my dear friend, for understanding shorter walks, yet insisting that we get out for fresh air. I especially thank my wife, Clara, for helping me carve out times to work on Generaciones after school and on weekends, for believing in the project and me, and for her unstinting love. Last, thanks to my father, John Wallace Scenters, and my mother-in-law, Marxina Rodriguez, voices of encouragement for anything educational. I know they will read Generaciones, watch it, and listen to it in loftier abodes than our digital realms.
